for much the more boldly do the flatters of these seditious fires burne, by how much the more gently with an easie breath, men seeke to put them out? Summon Traitors to friendly parlies, and they wake proud, insolent, and full of mischief: there is no phisicke therefore for such desperate maladies in a State, but onely the sword; and it is most fit that they who lift up their arme against Gods annoynted, should haue their Traitorous and Rebellious heads layd bleeding at their soveraignes feete.

The country of Ireland hath (like a disobedient childe) runne from time to time into all lawlesse and Irregular courses: pitty and piety haue bene banished from her bosome; Iustice hath had the sword snatched out of her hand to strike euen those magistrats that were her faith-full ministers; order, ceremonies and religion haue bene accompanied with cruelty, barbarous wildenesse and confusion, or rather not accompanied with them, but basely trodden down.

 hath Rebellion brought that nation, that nothing hath beene or still is pleasing to a great part of them, but that which in all Kingdomes Chull Wars: Murders and Malignes and vi-rors are to them as Musick & Banquets: bloud as the most delicate cups of wine: Thou needest not (O gallant country) to boast that no vene-mous beast is bred within thee, for the hearts of thy disobedient children are full of rank poyson: Thou hast deserved to be called not one of the daughters of Britannia, but to be rejected as a bastarde and albeit from time to time she hath beene vnto thee as a loving Nurse and Mother, thou canst not condemne her of un-kindenesse if shee proue vnto thee a stepdame.

 How many hundreds of thousands of our English nation haue beene drowned in their owne bloud, shee'de one by the other, how many of our Nobility haue lost their liues and beene confounded, whilst in their duty and allegiance they went about to endue thee with ciuility, or to chastize thee for thy Stubburnnes how many widowes haue bewailed the losse of their husbands, butchered by thy rebellious people? how many sonnes and daughters by thy meanes haue beene left fatherlesse? Yet if thou lookest backe (O Ireland) either vpon the fortunate reigne of thy late Queene and mistresse

(of happy memory) do not but number vpon the daies of rest which thy new royall soueraigne (our most gracious King) hath in his peacefull and blessed gouernment bestowed vpon thee, thou canst not aboose but confesse, that (thy ill detractions being so many) thou hast bene fauorably dealt withall, in being not punished according to the measure of thy offendings: thou hast bene worthy to haue bene beaten with rods of iron for thy vntunnesse, and to haue had fire the sword playe the executioners vpon thee and thy nation for their stiff-necked rebellion. But our Princes haue bene vnto thee in their correction as fathers are to children, when they punish them, yet nothing can win thee so goodnesse but weane thee from thy bloody and barbarous proceedings.

But let vs leaue this streame and hoist vp sailes in that sea where our intent was at first to end our voiage. And that is to discouer the onser and overthrow of a Rebell, on the conductor of Rebels, Sir Carey Adougherty. A You shall therefore vnderstand, that Sir Carey Adougherty, hauing with his bloudie associate (Fallin Reab Alack Day) committed that inhumaine murder vpon Sir George Paules, and others the inhabitants of the towne of Derry, thought with the Strategically Part, Quis in se ferit hunc potest scire that the onely buckler to defend villanies was to loyne the army of more villanies.

villanies to them: Being kept up to the hilt in blood, he perswaded himself that he was now time to go back; but rather to wage his fury, till he came to the chimney and carrying about him a conscience guilty not onely of murder, (a sinne that God never leaves unpunished) but also of his disloyalty to his Sovereign, in making uproares in his Kingdome, spoiling his subiects, and bringing his towne and citty (so farre as in his citty lay) to destruction and which offended his mighte worthily, and that the lawes of our land would not thinke into question; his fortunes therefore, his honour, his life and loyalty (as it was bound to be) cracked) did hee set on a desperate cast and (with the worst of) resolved to bee famous, albeit it were for nothing, but in being as a terror to his Prince and country, and in doing mischief.

For which purpose, calling by all shames humanitie, all respectes his country, and a regard of that duty, in which by reason of his place (as being chosen to be one of the Aldermen of the towne of Devoy) he stood bound; Instead thereof did hee stirre his spirit, which setled rancke against his Prince and his subiects; calling vnto him a company of drabs, whose hands did yett shake with the sight of the English most cheerously slung, and day by day increasing his rebellion and insurrection, with with numbers of dissolute persons, that were apt to vnder-take any mischieuous enterprize: men hardy enough to attempt, and resolute to execute, full of courage, if that courage had bene spent in honorable action; defying death, and any danger that could danc flesh and bloud, but yet so defying them, that it was rather out of a desperate fortune, then any constant fortitude, or noble valour.

This nest of Serpents, being thus hatched in mischiefe, were quickly fledged; and being feathered with ambition, treason, insurrection, and tyrannie, the body of them grew to bignesse, and in a short time, from a handfull, did their numbers increase, till they were nine hundred strong, or cleuen hundred at the most.

Then did this Ring-leader of Rebels wax insolent and haughtie: Fortunes nette he thought was put into his hands, and the draught which he made was to pull vp a kingdom: but the tree of Rebellion spreads fairely and largely at first, it promiseth great store of fruite, but so many Cater-pillers hang vpon it, and so rotten it is at the heart, that it withereth faster then it groweth, and is hewne downe and destroyed by the weight of his owne branches that fall vpon it. How can a petty Riuer contend with the maine Ocean? how can a Candle dim the glory of the Sunne? And what madnesse is it then for a meane subject to wrastle against the royall authority thoritic of his Soueraigne) Yet did Sir Carey Adoughertie in the height of his prowd overweening, thinke that like a while-winde hee should throw downe all that withstood his furie, and that like a storme at Sea, the whole kingdome of Ireland should vaile to him, to saue it selfe from shipwracke. But God, whose Angels, are the garde of Princes persons, and whose right hand steeres the helme, by which Kingdomes are gouerned, did arme the Lord Deputie, and the Councell of Ireland, not onely with present courage to encounter this Rebellion, but with wisdom to prevent, and to bear backe all stormes that by his boysterous and and turbulēt spirits were threatened to disquiet the peaceable state of the country.

One thousand English are therefore forthwith letted, and those diuided into three regiments, vnder the conductes of these Gentlemen and others, Sir Thomas Ridgeway, Treasurer for Ireland.

Sir Richard Wingfield, Knight Marshall of Ireland.

Sir Oliver Lambert.

Sir Richard Morrisson.

Sir Thomas Roper.

Sir Francis Russ.

Sir Toby Goffeld.

Sir Iohannes Dudley.

And

And besides these, diuerse gentlemen of name, all of them, vsing their best pollicie, to cut off the forces of the enemy: And because, they would bee sure, that hee should not escape out of the nettes prepared for him; those three thousand so diuided into three seuerall companies were directed to march three seuerall waies into the countrie, and by that meanes the Rebell, if hee durst come into the felds, might bee encompassed and set vpon.

Before I proceede any further, it shall not bee amisse to set downe one matter, as an argument, to expresse the confidence that Sir Cary Adougherty had in his forces, as also to shew the pride and highnesse of his spirit, and that was this.

The Bishopp of Derry and of those parts of the country had his wife surprized by Sir Cary & his accomplices, and by them held prisoner: no intreaty of the bishop, no nor the rancome of a thousand pound (which hee offered) could buy her out of their hands; wherevpon the bishop (who freely passed to & fro, as well to Sir Caryes to the English that were his friends, without disturbance, because he was a church-man) entred into speech with the rebell, about his vnaturall proceedings against the peace of his country. But Adougherty being careless of his reprehension, in the end spake thus. I vnderstand) quoth he)

that your Hotte-spur of the East (meaning Sir Thomas Ridgeway, the Treasurer) purposes to come into the field against me : I doe not thinke (sayes sir Carey) he dare venture so farre, because hee's riche: But tell him instead of his gold and siluer, I will meeete him with a good strong sword; hee shall haue sundry messes at his table, and be as well serued as euer hee was in his life, and so tell him.

But (for all these braues of the rebell,) Sir Thomas Ridgeway came into the field, and shewed his loyaltie to his Prince, and loue to his country, by his excellent seruice, performed by him that day, when the fight was.

The streame of ciuill sedition, like a Land-torrent, the higher it swels, the more vnresistable it is : order therefore was suddainely taken, to meeete with these rebellious troopes, so soone as possibly they could, to hinder the joyning of more forces to them. And whereas a fresh supply was sent ouer from England of soldiers, that were but raw & vnexperiēced in the wars; those bands were kept about Dublyn, and the old tryed soldiers were drawne forth, and appointed to vndertake this businesse.

About the middle of Iune last, did they come into the field (being as I said before three thousand onely,) and diuided into three companies. The place where this worke of death was to be finished, was within ten or twelue miles of the

of an Irish rebell,

Derry, an equal desire there was both in the English and Irish to encounter and meete one another; and albeir the English had the advantage of men, besides the uprightnesse of the quarrell, yet were the Irish nothing daunted, or terrified with multitude, but being full of hope, and desperately valiant, bravely kept together. The Musicke of warre struck vpon both sides, to giue encouragement to those that wanted no Spurres to prick them forward. Brauely was the onfet giuen, and as brauely answered; you would haue thought that Thunder had beene onely vpon earth, the Gunnes did speake so loud and with such dreadfull voyces, as if words meeting with swords, threw abroad such sparkles of fire, that the field seemed to bee all made of flames; and that the Essex furnace had there boeth kindled. Armes and legges flew vpon the ayre; to mock the aspiring ambition of them that wore them, who mensured the losse of their owne bloods, to trouble the still waters of a peacefull kingdome. while their senselesse headd lay weeping on the ground for the folly of their misters that could no better keepe them on any browe, then lead out to ignominy. The end of all battailes is to haue conquest on the one side or the other; but Fortune holding the Diuine swarre in her hand, made them stand so equal, by that it was hard to know which side should winne the victory. Many hurt they they fought with invincible courage, and invincible fortunes; till at length, one of those three companies, into which the English troopes were divided, secretly keeping aloof, came vp on the suddaine and unexpected of the enemy, on the back of the Rebel, so that hee was roundly beset with death and his officers. They were like a heard of lustie Deere encompassed with huntsmen, and every minute looked as how the smell of their deaths rang forth; yet so few that albeit they scorned life, they would not give it away for nothing, they fought courageously; because they purposed to sell their blood dearly. But alas! what strength of man can hold out when the finger of God is held vp against them? God added vigor, and knit the sinews of the loyal Subject, that hee might bee of power to confound the trayterous rebel; And that their pride might bee confounded even in that person, that first made them faithlesse to their countrey, and foes to their Soueraigne: heaven opened the hand of vaine confidence, and from without a bullet, which strooke Sir Carpe Abdiger quite through the head. The wound was mortall, for with it hee presently fell downe and dyed; but so fell downe, that his head lay directly vnder his cheste; (his head leaning vpward) and so was found slaine about some three hours after hee was shotte; the head being after

Sir Francis Fitzmaurice; And from the field sent to Dublin, where to stand by (lined on a pole) the veritable East-gate of the city, called the White Gate.

In this skirmish were lost on the English sides very few, of the Irish many; for the Irish being cut off, those that were his followers in such not and dishonorable as a long time, and so the desired addition of the war, so that in a short time they were all either slain or taken by a furious wind) blown away and dispersed to nothing. Since which time diverse of the Rebels are come in of their owne accord, and daily more and more doe submit themselves to that mercy, which Sir Arthur Chichester (the Lord deputy) hath by proclamation offered vnto them. JA

Thus haue I set downe the ouer-throwe of a man, whose fortunes might haue bin better, had not a turbulent & reuenging spirit dwelt in his bosome: But as the course of his life was bloudy, so (by the iust doome of heauen) was the conclusion of it. God neuer suffers a hand that takes a pride to be embrewed in slaughter, to scape unpunished. Note the ends of all such mutinous and barbarous-minded Rebells, that haue burne vp their country with the fires of ci-uill vproares, and haue layd wast the hopes of the poore hus-bandman, and you shall see that their deaths haue beene a suddaine, as bloudy, and as desperate, as their liues were treacherous, and seditious; let the fall thereof of this Rebell, bee a warning to all other his countrymen, that they reuolt not from that naturall loue and allegiance, which they are bound in conscience, in religion, and by the lawes of the kingdom, to pay unto their Prince and Soueraigne, least the selfe same or a worse confusion follow: not onely them in the height of their traitorous enterprizes, but their children and posteritie to bee reaced for euer from the face of the earth.

A Letter

A Letter sent from a Gentleman out of Ireland, confirming not only the truth of the late report touching the news of Longhens fall, but also this last action wherein O'Doghertie was slain.

Verily my friend, that you may see, and assure your selfe, that the sea hath not washed away my old love, nor this remote place removed my affection from that which once it was, I write these lines, having heretofore acquainted you with my steadfast-nesse in that kinde by a former letter. And because this may be but an idle repetition of that especially if you believe mee to bee honest hearted towards you, and a professor onely of what I thinke. I will omitte all complement, and plainly say that I love you truly, and that for the greatnesse of the worth that I have found in you, which if you beare as tis enough, if not all I can say will be too little; and so much for what Now to our newes; take it as it is, though as the second hand, and perhaps knowne before.

I assure my selfe you have heard of the fatalnesse of O'Dogherties action, and the burning of the Derry long since, and therefore to let that passe, I will follow him briefly in his other actions, which have perswaded me to his death. Thus I have written.

After the reader of this report was diligently perused, a signor of the court of the Kings of Ireland, who had beene in the of the said O'Doghertie, beinge the who passing to the Derric without hearing of the rebell, made from thence to Culmore a Fortie some four mile from it, which he had taken from Captaine Harry Harts by treacherie before he was put to death that kept it for the rebel, before he was set down before it, so that it was gotten without effusion of blood, though more honorably; for O'Donoghue being Captaine Harts guest, had under colour of friendship invited him and his wife to his house (as he had often done before) and having him there kept him prisoner, and swore to his wife unless she would use some means to deceiving the warders, and deliver him the Castle, her husbands life should answer for it, which to save she performed the night before the Dorrie was burnt. This Castle our forces having quite gotten, they marched after him to fight with him if he would endure, where they understood he was but hee having no such purpose, and being some country, and went into Mackswines being a place of more fastness. His wife, sister & daughter hee left in his country in a strong castle of his own, wher after his flight, the forces of the King came, and having surrounded it, sent out a messenger to offer for the Constable thereof, they brought a peece of Ordinance before it, from which the shot being made, & an offer of an assault given, did so daunt the defendants,

And when the yeomanry had taken the castle and were in it to the very last, where the Bishop of Derry (a man of a worthy name) rendered his life for the defence of the castle, and for whose ransom he had a few weeks before proffered 500 pounds, which was refused. O'Dogherty's sister & daughter being in the castle, were with some others sent to the castle of Dub in where they yet remained. After this blow given him, his Kernes seeing their hope perish, earnestly pressed him to do something against the King's forces if there would be time, which he would take to do. It being concluded, they appointed to set upon our men at the edge of a wood, as they should passe (going the to besiege Doe castle which he held) & there to cut off some of our forces. His notice being given, they found a horse welcome. The O Dogherty (having valor fitting a better man) thought to doe something worthy himselfe, and therefore caused his sister's father Phelim Reugh to lead a wing of shot, and himselfe came up in the reare, which was well performed, but in the going off, he being something to busie in shaking his Pike in a vaine flourish, was by a soldier of sir Francis Ruth his company noted (though not for him) and shotte through the head. Phelim Reugh seeing him fall, wheeled back and bestrid the body, thinking to recover it, which made the soldier gesse him to be a man of speciall note that was slaine, and therefore (being not so sodaintly able to charge his Peece againe) hee put powder into his panne, and made a false proffer, which Reugh perceiuing, and fearing the like fortune, left the body and fledde, upon which accident our men advanced forward, and gained his body; and this was his end who did so ill begin, and lay the foundation of his rebellion in the blood of his neighbours. Thus having hunted him to his death which hath been a tedious track, I will not dare to undertake a fresh sport in this kinde, though there are many Foxes in this Kingdome. But for Tyrone and Tyreconnell, they are already fled from their conceit, and I hope will never returne, and for other of false harts, the sheefe of note, as O'Case for Neale O'Donnell, alias, Neale Garret, and his two brothers, with others of their condition, have harts provided for them in the Castle of Dublin, where I hope they are safe enough for breeding (lets any Cabbes so as quiet or prey upon the flock of honest subjects in this Kingdome.)
